As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I am, by my political faith, by all the political training which I have received, against monopolies, and I stand here to-day ready to co-operate with every gentleman who may propose any measure that will take off the burdens now resting upon the tax-payer of the country. I am in favor of every measure that will lighten the burdens of the laboring men of this land; and I think I may say to my friend from New Jersey that not only myself, but the great body of Democrats who voted with me the other day in favor of the proposition to put tes and coffee on the free list, will be found ready to cooperate with him in the direction I have just indicated. But, sir, I have found, in considering the best way of advancing the interests of the poormen of this country, that our only hope of success in measures for their relief lies in dividing if possible those who represent these separate interests of the country. For instance, when the people clearly see and feel that by reason of the duty of iron they are paying an enormous tax upon that single commodity which enters almost every branch of industry and every article of domestic use, which I repeat, that the great body of those who think as I do—the great body of Democrats upon this side will be found co-operating with the gentleman in securing for the people of this country cheap blankets, cheap calico, cheap alpaca. I do not care so much about soda and saleratus, except so far as principle is involved. I think that many poor men in this country do not use articles; but I would cheapen every article en-tering into general use or consump-tion by the people. This is my po-sition. Whether propositions of this kind be put together in the aggre-gate or presented singly, the gentleman will find me voting according
